Mrs. Dalrymple's Governess.

It was an elegant room, a study in itself to any beauty worshiper. The curtains and carpet were a perfect match, and the furniture just unlike enough to harmonize. Every picture had its just amount of light and shadow, and each vase and knickknack was scattered in good taste.

Mrs. Dalrymple prided herself upon her establishment, and it was an oftrepeated boast, that she never had a friend Agatha a beauty, the servants fair and neat, and her governess as handsome as a governess need be.

They were all in the parlor one bright October afternoon, enjoying meaning of the word flashed on her. zy?" queried the bewildered sister. themselves with perfect freedom, as every member of this model household was allowed to do. Mrs. Dalrymple whelm her, and with swimming eyes When the confu was allowed to do. Mrs. Dalrymple was crocheting worsted. Agatha Canton was lying on the sofa, her arms wreathed gracefully above her head, wreathed gracefully above her head, chatting in her charming nonsensical manner. Master Rupert and Miss Belie were playing, the one with mamma's ottoman for a carriage and the piano-stool for a horse, the other keeping house in a bay window, with a huge doll and mamma's work basket. Miss Vane the governess was in one corner, in the shadow of acurtain, sewing on some dainty light, work.
